During a software engineering workshop, the presenter asked a room full of software engineers "Who in this room would get on a plane knowing your company developed the software that will fly the plane?" Only one hand went up. The presenter asked the individual "What makes you so confident about getting on this plane knowing your company developed the software that will fly the plane?". The individual answered "I know that if our company developed the software that will fly the plane, we're not leaving the gate!"